How Streaming Video Works

Streaming video over the Internet begins with a high quality recording. This requires professional equipment, proper lighting, sound and professional camera operators under the direction of our producers. It is just like having an entire television studio brought to your event. Once we have begun to record and capture your event live, we process the live images with a device called an encoder which changes your taped video stream into an Internet capable video stream suitable for viewing on your Internet connected computer. We then send your Internet ready video over networks to our streaming servers which are large computers designed specially to send your video out over the Internet.

Our professional producers manage your event

Individual viewers sitting at their computers can click a link on a web page, sit back, turn the volume up and watch and listen to your live event using any one of a number of free desktop video viewers. When your event is over we can provide you with statistics about who watched your event on the Internet. Since we record your event at the same time, we can easily make it available to Internet viewers after the event as well as to local television stations and cable stations for re-broadcast on regular television and cable channels..

A Professional Approach

Long before we stream your event on the Internet, our consultants work with your staff as advisors to determine what your needs and goals are and to plan for all of the services and equipment we will need to make your event a live streaming success. We can record a live meeting in your board room, do

Professional recording and the broadcasting of important events over the Internet is a cost effective way to remote broadcasts from places like the Yosemite Valley, or even provide a staged event in our broadcast studios. We plan and design with you all aspects of your event broadcast. We use an extensive check list to make sure that we cover all the bases and leave nothing to chance. Lighting, power, sound, networks, and camera positioning, all have an impact on the quality of the recording. We plan your event from the ground up using our expert personnel and equipment or integrating our services with your existing facilities. On the day of your event our staff arrive on location well in advance of the start of your event, with the right equipment and prepared to support and manage the entire broadcast.
